LaMar C. Berrett, who once was "pathetically ignorant" of Bible, has a home library filled with books on the scriptures and Church history.

OREM, UTAH

LaMar C. Berrett, a lean 6-foot veteran of World War II's Battle of the Bulge, was 21 in 1947 when he arrived as a missionary in Atlanta, Ga. A bespectacled, red-headed descendant of Mormon pioneers, he was anxious to spread the gospel throughout the Southern States Mission, but, he realized soon, he was not prepared.

LaMar Berrett has always been obedient. He was born in Riverton, Utah, the fourth of seven children of John Harold and Stella Wright Berrett, who stressed "living good." He willingly assumed his duties and responsibilities in the home and family. They enjoyed financial success during the early 1920s but struggled after the stock market crashed. Berrett remembers, as a 7-year-old, watching men repossess and haul off the family's electric stove, refrigerator and telephone. "I remember well going out to the 'gunnysack refrigerator' to get milk," he said, describing the burlap bag with water dripping on it to keep the bottled milk inside cool.

Later, his father went to work for an automobile dealer, and became manager. Young LaMar, who was president of his junior high school student body, earned spending money milking a cow every morning and evening and working with his father at the dealership. In junior high school, he played in the school band. During his first year in high school, he took private drum lessons for dance band from Merlin Shaw, an orchestra drummer. Shaw, whose time was limited after he had been called to a bishopric, asked Berrett if he would take his place in the orchestra.
